combine traditional patterns which were once functioning hieroglyphics in the societies that produced them, or be a canvas for the entirely new. There is some competition in Scotland, it's true, but Italy remains the world's pre-eminent producer of premium knitwear and boasts a diverse ecosystem of companies that have developed their own specialisms, techniques and styles. From dyed-in-the-wool luxury traditionalists that specialise in the lowest-micron iterations of cashmere and vicuna, to creative patternists who revel in the potential of intarsia interventions, Italy is it when it comes to knits. In fact the one thing that can't be said for certain about his thriving, exports-up segment of our fashion industry is exactly what innovations it will come up with next.
